

There was no question that UT was integrated, but there remained a question as to why there were so few blacks on campus. The new students' edition of the Daily Texas at the start of the 1971-72 academic year outlined some of the possible reasons: Black may be beautiful but it does present its problems, and the blacks at the University find they must make special adjustments for their special problems. There are approximately 300 black students on campus, a mere handful in a crowd of 40,000 students. The size of the group is the greatest problem for the students. "Sometimes I get the feeling I could go all day without seeing another black face," commented one student.
